Chapter One

His eyes opened onto darkness. His body convulsed, as though an electric current had charged through every fibre of his being, grating every nerve. He gasped for breath, but his chest felt as though it was Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) being gripped in a vice squeezing the air from his lungs. His body jerked as his arms stretched out for something just short of his grasp, his hands clutching at nothing but the air he so desperately tried to breath. Fear rippled through his mind as he fought the pain, an agonising terror that engulfed him. And the sound...that indescribable noise that paralyzed him in trembling dread as something moved in the dark shadows of his mind, shrouding him in a veil of harrowing emptiness.

His eyes focussed on an object in front of him, barely visible in the Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) bleak midnight. A sudden movement and something struck him full force. His body jolted violently as he breathed in, his torso rocketing forward into an upright position and his eyes opened. He sat gasping in oxygen, still shuddering as his brain caught up with his body. His eyes darted around the room ensuring that he was in a safe environment before his mind allowed his limbs to move. Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) He sat motionless for a few minutes, save for his chest rising and falling to the rhythm of his lungs, before attempting to move from the bed. Moving slowly, he gazed at his trembling hands and then to the left wall of the room with its pale green décor, usually a relaxing setting to wake up in. He planted both feet firmly on the cool wooden floor and stretched his arms out either side of him. Taking a deep breath he stood slowly and walked lightly to the mirror set on the Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) wall. Looking into his reflection he regarded his features as though they were only vaguely familiar, belonging to someone else rather than him. His brown eyes caught themselves in the opposite image, looking over the smooth, olive skin and the small mole on his right cheek, which his mother had always called a beauty spot.

After what seemed like several minutes his mind confirmed his identity. He ran a hand over his short, dark hair and tried to flatten the bed-head strands that stuck out in every direction. His muscles ached as much as his head after the ordeal of trying to sleep. The same dream every night for the last eight nights. Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) As far as he could remember it had been exactly the same each time. Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) Turning to the small table to the left of the mirror, he checked the time on the clock. 4:31. Exactly the same time he had woken from the dream on the previous mornings. It was an unsettling experience to say the least and the thought of it made him uneasy. It should have terrified him, but he was so tired and had become so accustomed to it that unease was the best he could muster. Had it been a simple nightmare, he would have brushed it off and put it Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) down to stress from work, but the fact that the dream was exactly the same as he remembered each time was what gave him cause for alarm. At least it was different from his usual dreams. He had spent so many years reliving the memory – the last day on Earth before he was evacuated with the others onto the spaceship Gaia.

Trying to push the images to the back of his Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) mind, he told himself that it was just a dream – a nightmare brought Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) on by too many hours of work and not enough time away from the shipyard and the pressures of everyday life. He had been so busy recently that he could barely remember the last time he had meditated, read a book or even just Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) walked somewhere with Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) no particular purpose other than to be.

He worked on the docks Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) of the space station as a Tech. The work was hard and often he would end up working extra hours. With so many of the Monsarri fleet actually being from the original Telazrian fleet, repairs were a regular necessity for the older ships. The newest ships in the fleet were mostly military or science vessels. For the last few months he had Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) dealt Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) mainly with the older vessels, doing patch-up work on the geriatric ships. For all his criticism of the Telazrian ships, the fact that most of them still operated after being in service for fifty or sixty years was testament to their design.

He Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) enjoyed his work and liked being on the station but had decided to live surface-side in Gaia city. The shuttle journey only took around thirty minutes from Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) the city to the station so caused little inconvenience. The station had been the remnants of the Gaia colony ship that had brought the Human population of the confederation from Earth. Once the city section had detached and settled on the moon Y'ralus, the remaining drive section and support structure had been set into Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) orbit. It was then expanded and upgraded with the help of the N'jarans and Telazrians to include the shipyard and space docks.

Sighing Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) heavily into the mirror, Eros Polgar shuffled from the bedroom down the hallway and into the kitchen, moving directly to the refrigeration unit on the far wall. Opening the door, he narrowed his eyes as the internal artificial light activated. It was not very bright, but it was enough to make him wince after his bedtime ordeal. He selected a bottle of N'jaran tonic water, closed the door and turned to the cabinet situated to his left hand side. He took a glass from the cabinet and poured the pale blue liquid into the tall transparent cylinder and walked with the glass in one Darkness Emerging (Monsarri Book 1) hand and the bottle in the other into the living room of his apartment. There was no point in going back to bed now and trying to sleep. The previous mornings had taught him that much.
