
Deathwatch

The call has come in and the team is assembling. We will gather at the patient's bed one by one and begin the deathwatch. Her vital signs will be monitored time and time again. Most will be recorded, but many will not. It will not change remarkably but will indicate a slow and steady decline.

Up until this time things have been mostly status quo. With a diagnosis made years earlier it Deathwatch was fully expected when Hospice was called that the patient was terminal and given approximately six months to live. That was two and a half years ago.

Today as the patient takes a turn things seem rather sudden to family and friends. They have never witnessed this process but many are in it for the long haul. Some patients go quickly and others do not. Families that can take it, Deathwatch stay close as they can. They become a part of the human deathwatch, just like those of us that do it for a living.

As a nurse's assistant specializing in end of life care it is my job to Deathwatch be a witness to death and dying. Months and even years can lead up to this time and no one will ever know exactly how or when the death will occur.

We can only monitor and comfort, keep the patient clean and attend to the family. We become stewards of death and helpers during a great time of need. We simply hold the space in a room that is the face of calm and love. We do not judge or grump; we listen and Deathwatch reflect human compassion and understanding. On good days.

Though no two people or their deaths are the same, there are some generalities that can be frequently be made.

Day 1.

The patient has changed and is not actively Deathwatch dying, but is clearly changing dramatically and approaching death. Family is called and informed of the impending death and any that want to say goodbye Deathwatch should come to do so. From that moment on, sisters and brothers, mothers and fathers, children both young and old, cousins and uncles all pour through the door to say a final farewell.

All have thought everything that needed to be said has been said, but in the actual face of death there is never enough time to really say it all. Everyone always wishes for Deathwatch just five more minutes with that loved one. Always. It is just the nature and finality of death.
