Description

1812 was a wild year, unlike the absolutely mind-numbing present. Daniella Harcourt was given a gift then that she didn't understand - immortality and a thirst for blood. It gave her a ticket out of the impoverished Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice world her gambling father cast them in. Now two hundred years later she learns that when we have not healed, we are always drawn to those who remind us of who we loved first and most: our parents. With her maker Elizabeth no longer around, lonely and bored Daniella has a choice to make, one that could endanger them all or be her salvation.

For Liana, my mother and hero. May you be reading this in heaven, and telling the angels, "I always told her she'd be a writer." I miss you.

Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice

In the very near future...

“You didn’t tell me I’d have to watch all the people I love, die!” he yelled, the volume of his voice preternaturally enhanced - painful to human ears. But she was not human. Not since 16 June 1812.

“I tried. You wouldn’t listen,” she reminded him, steadily.

“Liar!” Adrian yelled.

What happened next took six seconds.

With violent speed he grabbed her and threw her against the wall. She hit it with a loud crack and fell in a heap onto the ground. Like a flash she recovered, stood up and faced him, unscathed - eyes filled with anger and compassion. Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice She wished Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice she knew how to Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice get through to him, but she always wished that. She loved him and hated him. It didn’t matter.

She turned and, faster than his eyes Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice could see, was gone. Six painful seconds.

Adrian knew that Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice because Daniella was two hundred years older, she was faster and stronger than he was, for now. She left no evidence she’d been there. No blood on the floor. Nothing. Staring in disbelief at the empty space, he realized he might not be able to find her again. He probably wouldn’t see her unless she came looking for him and Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice after what he’d just done, that wasn’t likely. He dropped to his knees, red tears falling from his eyes, and yelled into the void, “Dani! Don’t leave me!”

A safe distance away, she slowed to the pace of a human’s swift gate, becoming once again Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice visible to any who passed. Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice Each quick step took her further away from him. Her mind never left. Could she have said something to him? Would he have been able to hear her this time? She couldn’t believe what she had seen, that his eyes were blue again. Light baby blue, as they once had been. Something had changed. Was it permanent? Was she in danger still? Were the others? She had to find out.

But first she had to get to them, see if she could stop the four of them before they... Maybe when she told them what she’d seen, they’d have an answer. If they didn’t believe her, if they didn’t want to investigate, Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice if they thought it was too late for mercy - she knew it meant a battle. Julian Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice would be on her side - Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice his loyalty was to her. The other three though... She walked faster. Had she been calmer, she would have felt the pair of eyes watching her. She would have smelled the familiar perfume.

“Dani,” the voice said. She spun around.

Present Day

Standing on a cliff off of Mulholland Drive, Dani stared at the city lights below. It was 10 p.m. This was where she often came to think, sometimes facing south overlooking Los Angeles, and other times, like this night, north, where she could watch San Fernando Valley Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice from above.

She sat on the dirt and stared ahead, searching in vain for the charm she once loved. The feeling was still there inside her—the numbness. It haunted Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice her constantly, imprisoned her more and more each day. She knew she should do something, should shake it, should try...but that would take motivation. She had none. What was the point? What could be done? She guessed that this must be what depression felt like to humans.

Everything looked dull and flat, even the twinkling lights of humanity below.

“I remember when that was beautiful,” she said aloud, her own voice Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice surprising her. Even it held no color, no light.

She heard the footsteps well before she saw their owner and her senses heightened to focus in on the approach. Leaves and branches gave way to fur. Twigs cracked under the steady weight of paw after paw, the snapping, dried wood getting louder. Wounds from flea bites bearing fresh scabs drifted into her nose. The stench of dirt, grime...and blood. From behind a bush stepped the coyote, male and large. Maybe it was the alpha of the pack, she couldn't be sure. It spotted her sitting five feet away, lowered its body, and smelled her.

Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice

Only her eyes moved as she watched it, clocking its every twitch. She waited as it took a step forward, its eyes glowing and hungry. But they changed to fear as it realized the Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice deadly truth; it was the prey and she the predator. Quickly it backed away and turned, lunging to escape into a bush and beyond where she could no longer see it, but could still hear its racing heart, the branches breaking, its paws pounding the hard, dry soil of the desert earth.

She could catch it if she wanted to, and she considered doing just that. It might shake off the numbness she felt, to chase it down. As she toyed with the idea, an unexpected car door closing to Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice her right interrupted her decision. She hadn't heard a car pull up. Getting careless, she warned herself.

Still looking ahead, she waited patiently as the footsteps approached, passing her own vehicle parked on the shoulder, a dirty, black Jeep Cherokee. The smell of human wafted into her nose, replacing the stench of coyote. Male footsteps; she could tell from the sound and weight of their fall. The human's scent had a soft, faded soap smell, a familiar scent she once loved.

Turning her head at a deliberate, human pace, Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice she locked eyes with a man approximately fifty years of age, an earnest, concerned look etched deeper into the already existing lines of his face. She smelled cut grass on him from the golf course; they used a certain kind of pesticide that was unmistakable. She quickly deduced that Fire Nectar Vampires: The Choice must be where he got those lines, because no one allows themselves to wrinkle in Los Angeles if they can help it.

Staring with barely concealed longing at his neck, she could see his pumping veins, could smell the cut on his finger from the envelope he'd opened a little too quickly that afternoon. Mmmm.
