Warm, red, liquid ran in rivulets through the hills and valleys Glory: The Gospel of Oliver of my laughter. Like a cell within plasma, I hung suspended beneath the eyes of Gods. They laughed with me, their child of the chosen, their prophet, their ultimate sacrifice. Gladly I died for the sins of my brothers, for the ancient sins birthed of Colony. Hundreds of yards above, huge insects, glowing with hues of crimson-streaked blue, swarmed in a hurricane of falling fire. Swirling with embers, they framed a clear patch of night sky like angelic sentinels, waiting to guide my spirit home.

Glory: The Gospel of Oliver

I, Oliver the fourth, great grandson of Oliver the first, looked into the eyes of my killer, and though my soul slipped through cracks of flesh, my smile remained locked in eternity.

—One day prior outside of Portertown—

“Oliver?”

Startled, the large insect took wing faster than I would have thought possible. A shadow fell across my brow, and I Glory: The Gospel of Oliver turned with my hand still poised in midair. I had been so close to finally touching one of these elusive, ethereal insects. Glory: The Gospel of Oliver

“Oliver, it’s almost night.” Nellie my younger sister of six years, emerged from around the trail’s curve, unaware of the forbidden encounter. She did not have the God’s gift of copper hair as I did, a sign of our divinity instead she was cursed with the dreadful glint of flaxen locks. Despite her sinful nature, she gave my raised hand an innocent, wondering stare. Long ago she learned to never look me in the eye.

“What’s wrong?” she said, her smile fading with my frustration.

I borrowed her smile, lowered my hand, and Glory: The Gospel of Oliver said, “Nothing. What are you doing out here?”

“You’re supposed to be giving tonight’s sermon.” She said it demurely, being careful to keep her eyes averted. My mother still coddled her too much, made her feel a part of this family, much to my disapproval. And much to my annoyance, I realized that she was right; I had lost track of time because of the irisfly.

“Go back,” I commanded, waving her away. “Tell mother I’ll be there soon.”

She began to walk away faster than she had come.

“Wait,” I said. She stopped, but didn’t turn. “And don’t forget—”

“I know,” she interrupted. “I promise I won’t join the congregation.”

With a quick glance of her blue eyes, and a flash of tauntingly yellow hair, she departed.

“Gods be with you, little sister,” I whispered. “May they have mercy on your soul.”

Everyone was faithfully gathered Glory: The Gospel of Oliver near the fire ring under the waning light of dusk when I arrived, all wearing the tarp loincloths of the chosen.

“My brothers,” I said, opening my arms robed in roughly woven garb. “To the glory of Glory: The Gospel of Oliver the Gods, and the glory of Colony.”

“Glory of the Gods! To the glory of Colony,” all sixty of them repeated dutifully. Firelight made their features dance as if eternal flame burned beneath their skin.

I stepped up to our makeshift pulpit under the canopy of Glory: The Gospel of Oliver our temple, the enormous bombfruit trees. Their leaves spanned for miles above our heads, creating a rustling, undulating emerald sea that was slashed with sunlight by day, and melted into a deep, rhythmic, starless, darkness by night.

“We stand beneath the oceans of redemption.” I could see their eyes close and bodies quiver as the tone of my voice lowered with spiritual fervor. “Tonight we sacrifice to Taranis of the sacred triad, and to the Holy Trinity. Glory: The Gospel of Oliver Amen.”
