Dedication

For all the lovers who choose to love in ways others don't understand and prefer it that way.

This book is for you.

Acknowledgments

Thank you to my previous publishers and editors for granting me a wealth of knowledge, letting me into this thing of ours, of which so many clamor to be a part, and for allowing me a successful career doing what I love.

Thank you, Sarah Wissel, for being a reliable, trustworthy, and efficient editor. Your youth does not precede your knowledge and I am honored to be able to add to your experience. I am looking forward to more.

Thank you to my readers, old and new. If How To Make Love To A Martian it weren't for you, I'd be sending my words into the ether and they would only return a void. I appreciate your support, your interest, and your participation.

Foreword by Datwon Thomas

Love is not real. Bullshit trap. Those were the words I read, scrawled in blue ink over a Carnival cruise ship ad, affixed to the wall of my commuter train. The picture was of a middle-aged couple in a pool, locked in an embrace and smiling. The scene was full of bliss between the lovebirds, but the quote written in chicken scratch (crudely interrupting the ad's premise)

How To Make Love To A Martian stung me for some reason. Not totally sure why, but the thought of the way love is used in marketing and promotional corporate structures did creep in.

Who's to say what love is and isn't?

Where does our emotion take us after we've fallen in love?

Why are certain types of love considered forbidden, if love is true and pure?

All of these questions popped into my head as I stared at the seemingly harmless advertisement. The question that hit the hardest though was, What the fuck is love?

Not that, look at my newborn baby love or the, my mom is the best kind of love. No. I'm talking about that can't stop, won't stop thinking about giving it all up for you or to you type love. The kind that turns the emotion into a battlefield of scars, tears, laughs, joys, screams, hurt, lust, fun, quirkiness, drama, sex, deceit, loyalty and business. Among other things. Love and its sticky attachments suck, sometimes. It makes you wanna holla at yourself to wake up from its grip of happiness, in fear of the inevitable pain that must be on the flip side — or its grasp of despair because there has to be more to it than the emptiness endured.

We know all too well the high that a love supreme gives us; this is why its twisted head comes draped in so many addictions. With its dependency, we fall into a place where the soul attaches itself to the definition of love it wants, even if it's not good for How To Make Love To A Martian us. Especially when it's not good for us.

So, what the fuck is love if it can hurt so much to experience? Love is the spirit of caring to the maximum level of shared connection. In most cases of coupledness, (yeah I said it, "coupledom") we mistake all the masks love hides behind in search of it in its rarest form. The fighting and fucking, kissing and hugging, the talking and tossing all winds up into what we live for in one another. How To Make Love To A Martian Figuring it all out is a How To Make Love To A Martian bitch, but one worth the time.

Now, How To Make Love To A Martian making love to a Martian should be simple, then. Especially How To Make Love To A Martian if you aren't one. Karrine Steffans is an intergalactic journey woman, but she's no Martian. Just a Martian lover. She's also a crazy so-and-so to boot, in her own right. How To Make Love To A Martian Karrine's wildest energy bursts of elation and evilness run a fine parallel line — lines that wrap themselves around the people she has feelings for — feelings that go beyond fleeting interest. She plays hard, hates hard, and loves hardest. The person, more than anyone else in this galaxy, who knows this first hand is Dwayne "Lil Wayne" Carter.
