Chapter 1 – The Psychoanalyst

[Annabelle remembered standing before the surprised Indian camp with her musket in her left hand as a walking stick, the butt on the ground, the powder horn around her neck, her blanket covered baby Clorissa on her breast and little bundled up Jane at three hanging onto her coat beside her. She stood and Memories of Lives Past looked quietly at the gathering women of the tribe and spoke nothing. Nothing needed to be said. She needed help and these people understood that. They had eyes. It had been the worst of winters and only now was there a glimmer of hope for survival!]

Elizabeth Perkins opened her diary of collected memories. The lives scrawled upon the pages of her private diary were Memories of Lives Past far from complete; but she made notes of events as they came back to her. Elizabeth knew that she had lived many lives before this one. That was the reason that she was under psychiatric care – not that it would ever do any good. They were simply memories of past lives and nothing more. Much of her earlier growing up years she thought that everybody remembered who they were before they were born. When she was a teenager she found out the opposite to be the truth. Nobody remembered past lives!

“I remember as Annabelle Parker standing with my two small girls before Memories of Lives Past the Cherokees with my musket in my hand Memories of Lives Past as a walking stick. All I remember was that they were kind and took me in. I also knew that my husband Justin was not there. I got the feeling that he was dead. I don’t know why other than the fact that I held the musket and he did not.”

Dr. Memories of Lives Past Preston looked up to see his colleague with his cup of morning coffee heading his way. Ray Memories of Lives Past figured that they would end up talking about Elizabeth Perkins. She was one of the more interesting patients that they currently had there. Little Rock was a large enough city to support psychiatrists treating those crazy people around them. Arkansas had enough crazy people to go around, so one did not have to look far to find patients.

“Morning, Martin,” the man said with a head nod toward an empty chair. Martin Holiday was not quite forty, a few years younger than Raymond was himself. Raymond had a full head of thick black hair with a little distinguishing gray at the temples. He looked actually younger than his colleague. Martin had very little hair left on his head. He had always been rather bald; both he and his brother Melvin. Their hair follicles had abandoned ship since Memories of Lives Past their birth. Who knew why? What Memories of Lives Past little hair the brothers had was very fine and of a light color. It darkened somewhat when they got a little older. Now that they were forty, looking mostly bald was not a big deal. When they were teens, it was.

“Ray?” The other psychiatrist took his seat beside his working partner.

“Elizabeth is scheduled for this afternoon. Do you want to take her this time?”

---

Martin discounted the double meaning in the man's question. He was single and Elizabeth was quite a pretty woman – dark green eyes and even darker hair – not green though – black. She was a few years younger than he was, (seven), and if she Memories of Lives Past weren't crazy, he would find that delightful. "I wonder if she'll dredge up any more memories from her past lives. How many is it now?"

"Eight."

Martin nodded. Actually the man had lost count. "At least she doesn't become the Memories of Lives Past personalities; she just remembers having been them in past lives."

"Who was the last one she dredged up?" Ray took a sip of his coffee. It was terrible!

"Annabelle Parker when she survived the winter that she lost her husband. She went to the Cherokees for help."

"Yes, I remember."

Again Martin nodded. "Two kids, right?"

“She certainly tells an interesting story. It’s too bad none of these past personalities can be confirmed. A gravestone marker with Annabelle Parker’s name on it would do the trick.”

“Indians don’t leave gravestones,” Martin noted the obvious. He wondered if she was buried in some communal mound somewhere. They had not gotten to that part of her memories as of yet. Frankly he believed that she had such an active imagination, that her subconscious mind invented memories for her to have to keep her company. She Memories of Lives Past was a lonely woman otherwise.

“I get the feeling that Annabelle did not become a squaw to some man either.” Ray remembered her mentioning something about a wagon train that took her and the girls in. “It was somewhere around 1738 Memories of Lives Past when the train passed through Cherokee territory.” Ray had looked up the information just in case she gave any pertinent information that he could verify. So far nothing was concrete. Perhaps he would ask again today. Then again, she just might not even know what year it was at that time. Sometimes Ray didn’t even know what year it was himself!
