- Richard Pryor

Fiona rushed through the graveyard, glancing through the drooping limbs to see a full shining moon. The time had come. She knelt by the feet of the cement angel, digging with a small garden shovel. Four minutes passed before the shallow hole met her approval.

"I wish to meet the person meant for me." She read the words and then laid the slip of paper in the dirt. The earth settled on top of the hopeful message. Fiona set a red candle on top with passion carved from the wick to the bottom. On either side she pushed a white Moon Spell votive into the dirt, lighting each of the three candles. Her body swayed with the wind. A humming filled the air. She realized the notes spouted from her own vocal chords. With a tiny knife she grazed her arm, close to her wrist. Three drops Moon Spell of blood fell, one in each pool of wax.

A crashing sound, a few feet away, interrupted her ritual. Fiona froze.

“Who’s out there?” A deep male voice carried in the blowing wind. “This isn’t a playground for you insipid teens.” His baritone instilled fear.

She blew out the candles, crouching next to a tall headstone, hoping he wouldn’t come any closer.
