Red Centre

Chapter One

Taken

The outback of Australia. The Red Red Centre Centre. A vast, harsh and barren land, full of canyons and spinifex-grass-covered hills. Vibrant red dirt stretched as far as the eye could see. A sunburnt and rugged country.

Yellow, red and orange Red Centre filled the sky as the sun started to set.

A small, two-story wooden house sat alone, nestled amongst small, red hills; the middle of nowhere.

A rusty, old, barbed-wire fence secured the large perimeter—protecting the house and two large Red Centre Red Centre iron sheds hidden at the back. Their weathered paint (or what remained) clung to them in feeble chips, Red Centre between spots of brown rust.

Two well-worn, wooden Red Centre chairs sat on the old veranda, neatly positioned to one side of the front Red Centre door. A nice spot to relax. A spot to feel the gentle desert breeze. To watch the sun go down after supper. But the wind was anything but gentle this night. A summer thunderstorm was rolling in.

Metal wind chimes hanging from the roof bounced about vigorously. Dust and tumbleweed blew in different directions. Loose, corrugated-iron roofing sheets flapped, banging up and down from the frenzied lashings of the wind. The front door was forced open, dim light spilling out into the darkening evening.

Frank Corbin stared into the sky, where small flashes of lightning lit up menacing clouds forming in the distance.

Trailing thunder rumbled, as though it was shaking the earth. A small, red light streaked across the sky above the house. Unusual. Maybe a meteor. He squinted as dust and wind blew into his eyes. Not sure what he had just seen, he shrugged it off, cleaning his grease-covered hands with an old rag.

He had been working on his old 1970 Ford Ranger F-250 pickup. Its faded, dark-green paint and rusty, dented body— testament of a hard working machine, in an even harder environment. It was the Australian version, steering wheel on the right.

Frank gathered his tools, tossed them back into his toolbox and slammed the hood closed. This had become almost a nightly ritual for the past month or so.
