Chapter 1

In the late 19th century South Africa was a different land. The North colonized by the Afrikaners, The South by the British. Around these times the British tried to get the North back under their control. THE AFRICAN TRACKERS: Part 1 - Finding Water. African fictional war story and african warriors, This THE AFRICAN TRACKERS: Part 1 - Finding Water. African fictional war story and african warriors, was the beginning of the first Anglo-Boer war. The native tribes were demolished, tribe-by-tribe, acre by acre. Kings fell to be forever forgotten by history and the once that survived to become legendary.

It was a hot humid summer day in the village. It was even way too hot for dung beetles to collect dung. The people in the village lazed around with pretence to carrying on with their chores. The men lazily sharpened their spears as the women lazily worked the maze. The children laze under the shade of the big tree, either than the murmurs the only sounds came from the cattle slowly roasting under the harsh African sun. Our village was not the biggest, nor was it the smallest. Our warriors were not the fiercest nor were they the most placid. Our women were neither the most attractive nor the most repulsive. The only thing that set the tribe apart from all others was the renown tracking skills the village people possessed. Most villages let them be as most have procured their tracking services and have felt a kind of benevolence towards them. The few tribes that have had quarrels with theirs have been scared in a way that only a hundred armies THE AFRICAN TRACKERS: Part 1 - Finding Water. African fictional war story and african warriors, can. The tribe was so renowned for tracking that even the white men armies knew about them.

On this day the relentless hot African sun was scorching the water out of the soil and the village people were unwillingly moistening the earth with their rivers of falling sweat. Then suddenly one of the parameter guards comes running into the village, "White men on horses approaching!". Like a pre rehearsed dance the men run for their spears, as the women hoard
