“Help!”

The old film projector chugged noisily in the dark, the image of a pure white stage wavering slightly. Through the overhead speakers, a prerecorded orchestra began its uplifting tune. Responding to the female’s scream, a man in a black and white outfit jumped into the center of the screen, a white full face helmet hiding his identity. A large “X” shaped visor covered most of the helmet’s front, the mesh wire breathing slit under it resembling a zipper. He stood tall with his fists on his hips, the back of his black trench coat flapping in an artificial wind like a cape.

His voice was muffled from the helmet and from the poor sound quality. “Did somebody say help?!” He pointed a finger up. “No need to fear, the Oneiro Rangers are here!”

Hundreds of students in the assembly room clapped and cheered as the man on screen jumped somewhere off camera. A stage light toppled over and fell in front of the camera; the man’s offscreen landing shaking the unsteady set.

“Yes, the Oneiro Rangers,” the nasally narrator said as a boom mike dropped down from the top of the screen. “Fighting for the greater good.”

“Where Nightmare’s lurk, the Oneiro Rangers are on the alert.” A still picture of the Oneiro Ranger slowly zoomed in, his flashlight held up to shine down on a hideous fanged creature. The mouth of the man wearing the creature costume could easily be seen between the suit’s rubber teeth, his five o’clock shadowing being a dead giveaway. “Shedding light on even the darkest situations.”

The film skipped to a warehouse full of people in cages, some of them being put in a cardboard cutout of a delivery truck. A few people wearing domino masks and burglar beanies laughed evilly as they put the crates in the trucks. From the right side of the room, the Oneiro ranger from before barged in, tearing through a paper door.

“The best of policemen,” the narrator said.
The Oneiro Rangers: First Night

“Stop right there,” the ranger ordered with his gun out. Other police officers ran by him to handcuff the surrendering bandits. “You are all under arrest!”

The film skipped again to show a beautiful woman being cornered in a dark alley, screaming for help. In a torn up gorilla suit, her attacker waddled closer and closer, tripping on the floppy feet of his stitched-up costume. Bat wings were glued onto the back, ready to fall off at any minute. Holding the sides of her face, the woman shook her head and shrieked.

“Oh, save me, Oneiro Ranger!”

“Defenders of the innocent,” the narrator added.

The Oneiro Ranger tore through a paper wall that was painted as a brick one, knocking down a couple of metal trash cans. He pointed his pistol at the winged gorilla, a trash lid rolled by his legs. "You are a plague for humanity. Take this!"

Everyone froze as a bright cartoony line came out of his gun's barrel towards the monster, making a slide whistle noise. It let out a lazy droning yell, then disappeared in a puff of smoke. The woman ran out to hold the ranger, her right leg bent back happily.

"My hero!"

The ranger put an arm around her waist and rested the gun on his shoulder. "Not just your hero sweetheart," he turned his head to The Oneiro Rangers: First Night face the camera, "everyone's hero."

The film skipped loudly and flickered, changing to a different scene. The white Oneiro Ranger now stood in front of a giant Normlock flag with his arms crossed and his chin held high. The black and white flag fluttered out The Oneiro Rangers: First Night of control, wrapping around to cover the screen in stripes.

"The Oneiro Rangers," the narrator continued as the camera backed away. "Protectors of dreamers. Turning bad nights into good days."

The students clapped loudly as the tape in the movie reel snapped to a stop. The overhead stage lights in the assembly room turned on, revealing the academy's small number of council representatives. They sat in wooden chairs on stage, being watched by hundreds of young soon-to-be rangers. The oldest of the council members stood up and approached the podium in the middle of the stage, hunched slightly as if accustomed to using a cane.

He settled the students with a weary wave The Oneiro Rangers: First Night of a hand. "I must thank all of you for choosing The Oneiro Rangers: First Night such a diligent and gratifying career. For choosing to be one of the few and the proud, the brave and the bold, the..."

Clint looked at him from his seat in the line of council members, an almost disgusted sneer dripping off the side of his lips. He scratched at one of his freckled cheeks in disappointment, easing in to cup his mouth to the side. "Is it just me, The Oneiro Rangers: First Night or does that film The Oneiro Rangers: First Night get worse every year?"

"Both," Rhonda chuckled to herself beside him. She sighed, crossing her legs and holding her knee with her fingers laced. "The kids seem to like it, so it's The Oneiro Rangers: First Night fine with old-man Abend."
