Freddie Price lived in a town called Ferrybridge at number 8 Inkerman Street, with his older brother Steven, his sister Rachel, and their guardian Uncle Billy. The street had old-fashioned terraced houses on one side and the cardboard box-making factory where Rachel worked The Spell. on the other. At the The Spell. top of the long street on the corner with Naseby Road was the Late Night Opening Convenience Store, and at The Spell. the bottom was Miss Williams' florist The Spell. shop. For years, Miss Williams had made all the funeral wreaths for people who lived and died in the area; she had also made the wreaths for his parents' funeral after they died The Spell. together in a car crash.

One day as Freddie was sleeping on a grimy sofa in the front room, with a polystyrene The Spell. container holding the remains of his evening meal resting across his knees, a sudden loud noise outside woke him. He yawned, stretched, then belched before throwing the container with the burger bun crumbs on the floor. On his way home from the shopping precinct, Freddie had swapped a stolen CD for his burger with the man serving at the takeaway. Now all he had left from a day's work shoplifting was a packet of felt tip pens and a book. He took out a mauve pen from the packet and started writing The Spell. something in the book when the door to the room suddenly opened and Rachel walked in.

"Quick, get upstairs; Uncle Billy and Steven are coming up the path," she told him at the same time as Freddie was cramming the pens and book into a plastic bag. "Have you been pinching things from shops again?" she asked.

Caught out, Freddie tried blagging his way out of it. "No, what makes you think I'd do stuff The Spell. like that?" He sounded insulted by her accusation but The Spell. his red face gave him away.

Loud voices at the front door and the sound of a key turning in the lock warned them that the men were entering the house.

Just as the front door slammed shut, Freddie ran upstairs and reached the bedroom he shared with his brother Steven. He hid the book and The Spell. felt tips at the back of the drawer in his bedside cabinet.

Suspended from school for vandalising the headmaster's car months before, Freddie had never bothered to turn up for any of the private lessons the education authority had arranged for him. He started stealing to break the monotony of wandering aimlessly around the shopping precinct. Just small things at first, like a pen or batteries, then as his confidence grew, he stole expensive things like CDs. It was easy until shops in the precinct had a clampdown on any boy or The Spell. girl seen in the supermarket when they should have been in school. That afternoon, the security man suspected him straight away of being up to no good but he gave the man the slip by hiding behind the delicatessen counter.

He heard a commotion, as if chairs were falling over, and the voices of Uncle Billy and Steven arguing with Rachel in the kitchen. Then some time later, a light tread on the stairs told him that she was coming up.

“Hey Rache, thanks for that,” Freddie called as she walked in and sat down wearily on the bed. “What’re they doing now?”

“As usual, they’ve been drinking in the pub,” she answered. “And now they’re finishing off a pizza between them; most likely they’ll be out all night thieving for their beer money tomorrow, so you’ll be okay to come down and watch a bit of telly later.”

“One day when I’m older, I’m going to get him!” Freddie blurted out, punching his headboard in anger.

Rachel frowned. “Don’t be stupid. You’d have to be as big and as ugly as him to do that.”

“I know! I’m not that stupid!”

Rachel raised a cynical questioning eyebrow.

There was a moment’s silence between them until Freddie asked her something that was obviously bothering him. “Why doesn’t Uncle Billy pick on you or Steven?”

“He picks on me too!”

“Yeah, but not the same, and he never picks on Steven.”

“He never got on with our dad even though they were brothers, and you look a lot like our dad.” The Spell. She shrugged. “Maybe that’s the reason or it’s just that Steven’s weak and does everything Uncle Billy wants him to.”

“Or it’s cos I ran off when they wanted me to climb through a window and help them break into that big posh house,” Freddie suggested. “He’s been worse with me since then.”

“Most likely,” she replied. “Anyway, I’ve never asked, where did you stay that night? He wouldn’t let me report you missing to the police. I was worried sick until you came home.”

“I stayed in one of the sheds on the allotments,” Freddie explained. “They’re all locked up now though and an old man guards ’em.” He laughed but Rachel just stared at the bedroom door as if she expected their uncle to barge in at any moment.
